It all seems a long way from music and nightfall. But it doesn't take very long for the reader to discover that, in Nocturnes, Ishiguro is conducting a different kind of writerly experiment, whose design is just as stringent as that in his previous book. It is as though Ishiguro had laid down a group of thematic and stylistic ground rules, and challenged himself to write five stories that obey them in utterly different ways.

In this story, Ishiguro captures the main theme of the entire collection, that music is an ideal state which has no connection to the realities of life. This collection is subtitled 'Five Stories of Music and Nightfall' and all the stories are connected directly to music, but not all take place at nightfall. Yet they all explore a sense of melancholy – the 'blues' if you will – that come at that time of the evening and all are concerned with the passage of time and the movement ...

All five stories are told through the eyes of an individual whose life and relationships are somehow defined by music -- a struggling sax player, a 40-something teacher whose sole tie to an old friend seems to their love of the same music, a young would-be songwriter, a cellist, an Eastern European playing in the bands of San Marco square in Venice. The tone, to put it in musical terms, is that of an elegy -- a plaintive lament for what might be, what never can be, what might have been.
